

LISKOW

THE ENERGY OF INNOVATION

LAUNCHED IN 1935 to service the energy industry, Liskow’s founding attorneys had a significant impact in matters establishing Louisiana’s mineral and conservation case law.

Though its past is threaded directly to oil and gas production throughout Louisiana and Texas, new innovation for Liskow energy clients includes wind, solar, and carbon capture utilization and storage (CCUS) as the energy sources and low carbon technologies of the future.

Through generations, Liskow has not only evolved with renewable resources, it has been a dynamic driver of these alternative energy efforts as a leader in helping businesses make environmental and economic change here in Louisiana, across the Gulf Coast, and beyond.

CCUS can be a complex process, but Liskow prides itself in being a one-stop shop for carbon capture solutions, crafting and negotiating property agreements with landowners, guiding clients through the developing regulatory maze, and navigating the state legislative process to update CCUS laws.

Future focused, Liskow’s foundation was laid almost a century ago, but its current roster of 150 attorneys across four offices in New Orleans, Baton Rouge, Lafayette and Houston has a progressive, inclusive and business-minded culture today. Fifty percent of its attorneys are diverse, and the firm services clients in the energy, environmental, and maritime sectors, as well as local and regional businesses in virtually all industries.

“As a mid-size, full-service firm with local history, we are able to provide high-quality legal services at a better value than our big law peers,” says Mark Latham, managing partner at Liskow, and an attorney with more than 30 years of experience in representing companies involved in the oil and gas and petrochemical industries.

Always willing to reevaluate itself, Liskow recently reassessed what its long-standing brand conveys to the public, leading to a complete rebrand in late 2022.

“As our clients across all industries undergo significant evolutions in their businesses, we believe our new brand authentically positions us as a progressive and cutting-edge law firm for all our clients’ needs,

Liskow's Baton Rouge office

now and in the future,” says Liskow Marketing Director Rachael Schilling.

In addition to a more navigable website, the firm rolled out a fresh visual identity and a crisp logo featuring a shorter name—dropping “Lewis” for the rebrand, though Liskow & Lewis remains the official name of the firm.

Along with a new look and time-tested expertise with a vast array of business initiatives, Liskow’s comprehensive capabilities are even stronger with the addition of a government relations practice.

“We’re not down at the Capitol just reporting back on what transpired,” says Liskow environmental litigator Neil Abramson, a former member of the Louisiana House of Representatives and now a registered Louisiana Lobbyist. “We are proactively pushing legislation and advancing specific projects for our clients, which really sets us apart.” Abramson’s experience serving as Chairman of both the House Ways & Means Committee and the House Civil Law Committee allows Liskow to develop and implement precise strategies, knowing in advance how to best position those plans for advancing or safeguarding client interests. In the past two legislative sessions, Abramson drafted and lobbied specifically on CCUS legislation, paving the way for Louisiana to become a national leader in CCUS projects.

This is evidence that Liskow is not just a law partner for its clients, but a dependable, cutting-edge business partner, too, Schilling emphasizes. This focus on client service and sustainability has been key to the firm’s expansion and its impact locally.

“We want to help Louisiana grow economically,” says Bob Angelico, leader of Liskow’s tax practice who has worked closely with Fortune 500 companies and small start-ups for decades. Liskow carries a legacy of mentorship and handed-down expertise with a consistency that, in some cases, surpasses that of the state’s regulatory departments, which can experience more frequent turnover than the firm.

Many Liskow employees have spent their entire careers there, some for as long as 50 years. It is this stability of varied, high-level competencies inside and outside of the energy sector that Liskow has maintained for generations and that clients value most.

“Our expansion and our evolution have been very deliberate,” Latham says. “And through all of that, we have stayed true to our roots. Liskow has not lost its deep connection and commitment to the state of Louisiana.”